The Market for Manuscript.

One great difficulty with which the maker of manuscript is obliged to contend is that his manuscript is constantly overlooked. He is prone to think that, if he furnishes a clever poem, a bright essay, a well written, interesting story to a periodical, it will be certain of acceptance. But it will not be, unless accompanied by a well known name, which will carry the contribution independent of its merit. When a man has reputation he can dispose of anything he may write. Before he has acquired reputation his best may go begging. The general reader's judgment of literature of any kind is commonly founded on the fame of the writer. He admires what he believes he ought to admire; he recognizes ability through the eyes of others; he adopts outside opinions as his own.

The manuscript market seldom respects the periodical to which he has sent his contribution has already on hand a number of clever poems, bright essays, interesting stories, for which it cannot find room; consequently, if the editor tells him so, he is inclined to discard it. In truth, only a few of the initiated have any conception of the continually increasing number of manuscripts that flood every office in the land. But that so many are printed. Not one out of twenty, prepared with care and confidence, ever sees the light of day. The ink mania rages universally, and is incapable of abatement.—James Herlihy Brown in The Forum.

Peculiarities of Plains Cattle.

The cattle reared on the plains are very different in their habits from those of the east, where they are accustomed to have their every want attended to by man. The difference is much like that between savage and civilized man. The cattle of the plains have to "rustle for themselves," and early acquire habits of self-reliance. "They have peculiarities in their nature common to the buffalo," writes Baron von Richthofen, in his interesting little book on "Cattle Raising on the Plains." For instance, they run away if they see somebody on foot. A cow will often defend her calf when it is caught by the lasso; they move about in families, grazing and herding together, and the attachment of a cow to her calf, and vice versa, is much greater than that of a domestic animal. Here and there one can watch groups of families where the offspring of three or four generations have never been separated. The mother of all retains her authority, and even punishes her children and grandchildren, though they may be much larger than herself, but in the defense of families the female yields precedence to the male.—Chicago Tribune.

An Affectionate Man.

A man who has an office on Broad street, and whose name is seen often in the newspapers, put $500 on deposit with one of his stockholder friends a month or two ago, and yesterday, in answer to a message from the broker's office, he called to get an accounting.

Three thousand dollars was to his credit as profits. The Wall street office was filled with people watching the tape when he called, but he forgot all about that when he saw the statement which showed his good luck, and with never so much as a hint of purpose he threw his arms around the broker and then and there most ardently kissed him. He kissed him now once or twice only, but a full dozen times, and possibly would have kept up his salubrious game of osculation till the day was done; but men down town are rare, and so the broker brought him to a stop. The broker—poor man, he didn't look half as happy as he might have looked had somebody else done the kissing.—New York Times.
